HELEN was written by Euripides nearly 2,500 years ago for the City Dionysia festival in Athens. It re-imagines the fate of the most infamous woman in Greek myth: what if the real Helen never went to Troy? What if vengeful gods had spirited her away to Egypt and left a phantom double in her place, provoking ten long and brutal years of war? Stranded in a far-off court ruled by a tyrant king, the real Helen barely maintains her freedom until her husband Menelaos, homeward bound from the Trojan War, shipwrecks on her shore. Now they must reunite and escape before their captor discovers Menelaos' presence and kills them both. HELEN seeks to clear the name of the woman who launched a thousand ships, and never wanted to.
